SEMITIC LANGUAGES: FEATURES, STRUCTURES, RELATIONS, PROCESSES BY GIDEON GOLDENBERG PDF

This book offers a thorough, authoritative account of the branches of Semitic. These include some of the world's oldest attested languages, among them Akkadian, Aramaic, Hebrew, Arabic, and Ethiopic, as well as various modern languages. Gideon Goldenberg describes their history, geographical distribution, writing systems, and genetic classification. He examines their main features and distinctive characteristics, including their phonology, morphemes, derivational morphology, verbal systems, syntactic relationships, and their typological significance. He also discusses the pioneering work and achievements of medieval Arabic and Hebrew scholars in theoretical and descriptive aspects of grammar, lexicography, and philology. Professor Goldenberg's balanced, undogmatic account presents the fruits of a lifetime of original research: it will be widely welcomed by scholars and advanced students of the Semitic languages and linguistic typology.

This is not for general audience. But if you are looking for a linguistic analysis of Semitic language, this is it. I'm not an expert, and cannot comment on the technical quality. I picked up a copy because the author presents an empirical view rather than a completely theoretical view of Semitic Language linguistics. That's what I wanted.
