"World Vision president Richard Stearns shares scripture and inspiring stories of people who make a difference to encourage a renewed sense of passion, meaning, and purpose in all Christians. The book explains the Christian response to God's invitation to be part of His greater work, which Stearns describes as finding one's own unique calling. With warmth and clarity, narrator Wayne Shepherd explains why patience and faithfulness are necessary in a journey of self-discovery. He perfectly renders Stearns's counsel to live the teachings of scripture because that effort is how listeners will find their unique callings. Stearns also criticizes consumer-oriented churches that entice attendance with latte bars or Vegas-style music, efforts that he believes are contrary to biblical teachings." A pleasant surprise, a deep and abiding call

By Dawn M.

As a theology student, I appreciated the biblical grounding and the prophetic voice of this book, it is exactly what the church needs. Two things struck me about this book, it's the strong call to action that the Christian world needs and it's a pleasant surprise for a second book. In the sophomore offering where most authors downshift, Rich Stearns instead has doubled-down on the message from The Hole in Our Gospel, turning his personal message outward to those who are sitting on the sidelines. His message: get in the game and find the significance you long for. There is a lot of kingdom work still undone, and we need to get to it. I was inspired and moved to stop doing the 'spiritual bodybuilding' that only benefits me, and get out there and exercise some muscle on behalf of the kingdom. A great book for anyone!

good read with misplaced emphasis

By B. Dempsey

There has been a rash of "total commitment" books published in the last few years. Books like Radical and Crazy Love have called for American Christians to rethink how the Gospel should affect how they live. Unfinished is a similar work in that it makes a clarion call for believers to completely sell out for Christ. Another key vein of writing within the Christian publishing tradition has become the theme of social justice and how the Gospel should affect society in that regard. Stearns ties the two together, much as he did in his first book, tying very closely the concepts of complete devotion to Christ and working towards social justice and poverty alleviation.

The book nailed it on a few points. The American church overall is in a bad way. We have neglected the Great Commission, and our churches are shrinking because we have allowed our walks with Christ to decline and lose their fervency. A call to restore passionate discipleship is needed and welcome, and Stearns provides it. The book also brings a greater awareness of the needs around the world that can be met through the outreach of missions. There is much to be commended.

However, there are a few areas of concern, much as there were with The Hole on our Gospel. Stearns frequent emphasis on advancing the kingdom in some places seems to confuse the Great Commission's advancement (through the making of disciples) with the advancement of kingdom morals through social justice. This comes to a head on page 53, when Stearns refers to the Great Commission as "nothing less than a calling to partner with God in establishing a new world order. This was the mission." If this is the measuring stick, then the church has indeed failed, and that miserably. Stearns also seems to lay fault for the delay in the Second Coming at the feet of the church- thus the title of the book. Once the task is finished, the End will come. These are two major weaknesses that distract from the beneficial call to discipleship. Christians need to keep in perspective that everything ultimately comes back to the Gospel and the call to make disciples to the glory of God. Everything else serves to advance the Gospel. Our social work is necessary, for it shows our faith- it does not contribute to a political empire, but reflects the love of the Savior to a world that desperately needs the light of redemption.
